An example of what I am talking about is: def some_function(func): def wrapper(): # do stuff here... return wrapper I can use some_function(some_function) to call the defined function some_function, but my question is, can someone explain what this is called in python and explain how to use it? A: It's called an "ad-hoc" function, and it's similar to a closure. Most (all?) of the functions and methods that python uses have a similar syntax, so that it can be used from anywhere and can be passed around, and used in any context where a function is needed. This is also used to add behavior to objects in python, for example. Often it's used to save lines of code, in cases where a method is needed just once, but a complex object will already have many methods, it makes sense to create a "private" method on an object that doesn't need to be accessed from outside, it can just be called on the object. This is basically the case of defining a function inside a function. Look at some answers to this question for more information about closures and ad-hoc functions. Q: Paragraph not aligned by my grid system I'm trying to align paragraphs on a fluid grid system, but no matter how much I inspect my grid, I'm not having any luck. I would've thought alignment by a grid system would be rather simple, but I can't seem to make it work. Here's my HTML: Lorem ipsum d f678ea9f9e
